

I think it is absurd to overturn the NJ Do Not call Law. NJ residents have overwhelmingly let their voice be heard, and don't want to be bothered by unsolicited advertising. Overturning or weakening this law, amounts to nothing more than bending to the pressures of the "telemarketing community" If I remember the Constitution correctly, any powers, not specifically granted to the Federal government nor explicitly denied to the states, fall under the rule of the state. Is the FCC above the Constitution? If a state has a harsher law than the Feds against drug use or any other crime, would the US seek to overturn that law as well?
